Or, in other words, will it not pay to use more skill and intelligence in the business of farming? There is altogether too much of a tendency on the part of farmers, as soon as the community in which they have located becomes well settled up, and land increases in value consequent on the general prosper of the people, to sell out and go to a new and unsettled country because they can get land cheaper. They fail to recognize that condition of things which makes land high in price; namely, a thickly settled community, proximity
